

23-2f “. . . Within a Country . . .”

GDP measures the value of production within the geographic confines of a country. When a Canadian citizen works temporarily in the United States, her production counts toward U.S. GDP. When an American citizen owns a factory in Haiti, the production at her factory does not contribute to U.S. GDP. (It contributes to Haiti's GDP.) Thus, items are included in a nation's GDP if they are produced domestically, regardless of the nationality of the producer.
